I had decided to take the route across the dry bush-covered Kalahari Desert on my way to Windhoek in South-West Africa. This indistinct trail (16) concealed by dry bushes would cut my journey by a thousand kilometres. Having started on this journey, I now found myself really out of luck. A slow leak had emptied the radiator of my car and I was forty kilometres from the nearest village of the indigenous bushmen. (17) Dejected, I could not help wishing that I had a burst tyre instead – I could have changed it without any help.

I had been sitting in the car for an hour, trying to decide whether to pour the last of my drinking water – about three litres – into the radiator or down my throat. I knew better than to venture out. Although there was no (18) imminent danger from wild animals, the Kalahari, with its sudden dips and rises, is a deceptive place. Turn around a couple of times and you are lost. I was not (19) optimistic about my journey ahead.

The sun flared (20) murderously overhead and made an oven of the car. There was no breeze and, to add to the discomfort, stinging sandflies were beginning to mass on the inside of the windscreen. All this was bad enough but not until I spotted a Bushman – a member of the hunting and gathering people of Africa – did I feel any sense of real danger.

HUB

About Writers' Hub

Writers' Hub is a school that is dedicated to helping primary school pupils become more effective and confident English Language writers. The school's principal, Mrs Joyce Wee, was an English Language Senior Teacher in one of Singapore's reputable primary schools for more than a decade before she established Writer's Hub. Consequently, she brought her wealth of knowledge and experience with her, and Writer's Hub has achieved rapid success.

As a start, Mrs Wee led a hand-picked team of English Language educators and developed the customised worksheets that the school's pupils use. Their top priority is to ensure that their pupils' needs are met. On a yearly basis, the team carries out thorough revisions of the worksheets so that the worksheets are never out of date. In addition, Mrs Wee conducts regular training sessions for the educators and shares with them innumerable ways to teach writing effectively.

The hard work put in by Mrs Wee and her staff has certainly paid off. Every year, Writers' Hub's pupils receive commendations and awards in national and international writing competitions. Visit the school's website to view the winners' profiles as well as read the winning entries!

Big fat drops started falling from the sky, quickly forming puddles on the road surface. Several people hurriedly held their briefcases above their heads and hastened for shelter. Bob looked up in dismay. Ditching his initial plan of waiting for a bus, he followed them. Trust it to rain on the day of his job interview! There was a time when he could splurge on luxuries. Unfortunately, he could ~~not afford to do so~~ after being jobless for the past few years. This job, if he clinched it, would turn the tables. No more eating microwave food for dinner, finally, a decent meal for his family. All he had to do was pass the interview. To do that, he needed to make an excellent first impression. How could he do it if he was late? Luckily, the unrelenting pelts of rain masked the hot tears that were flowing down his cheeks, away from prying eyes. He was desperate to get to that job interview.

Pushing his way through throngs of people, Bob ran to the nearest shelter he could find, which happened to be the train station. "My previous plan didn't work, but perhaps I could still make it if I take the train," he thought. An elderly lady accidentally knocked into him, causing the contents of his briefcase to fall out. "I'm sorry, I didn't..." she said. Bob cut her off, gesturing it was fine and hurriedly gathered his things. Once he reached the platforms, he was crestfallen when he saw that notices had been put up everywhere informing of a ten-minute delay. Time dragged by in an excruciatingly slow manner. Many people around him were tapping their feet, checking their watches while some were trundling their trolley bags along the platform.

Ten minutes came and went. Something was wrong. The floor was flooded. The pipes had burst and water began gushing out. The ceiling was leaking. Panic ensued, followed by a chaotic rush to the exits where a bottleneck had formed. As Bob made his way to the exit, he saw the elderly lady who had knocked into him earlier. She was obviously struggling to hobble along amidst the commotion, clutching her walking stick with her frail hands for her dear life. Fear was written clearly on her face. Though it would slow him down further, his heart went out to the old lady. "Auntie, let me help you," he muttered and without waiting for a reply, he placed her hand on his right arm. She was jittery at first but her tense muscles soon relaxed. After some time, they made it out of the flooded platform. Not wanting to forsake the old lady, he decided to help her to her destination. After all, there was no way he could make it for his interview now.

Noticing his obvious gloom, she asked, "Son, why do you look so sad?" Bob sobbed bitterly, "I have been jobless for years. Finally, I was going to go for a promising interview today but the heavy rain ruined everything! Maybe I am just a failure. That's why no one wants to employ me." He could almost hear his wife chiding him for saying that. "You are a talented and hard worker. No one has discovered that about you yet. That's all," she would say.

The lady replied, "Don't worry. You are a decent man. I am sure things will work out for you once the financial crisis the country is facing is over." Hearing her encouraging words, he brightened up. The skies had cleared up by then as well. "This is my destination," the lady said. The words "Zane and Zane Law Firm" caught Bob's attention. Having been lost in his thoughts, Bob had not realised where he was heading. "This was where my interview was supposed to have been!" he remarked as an immaculately-dressed young man rushed out to meet the old lady.

"Grandma, it was a horrible storm! I was so worried for you!" he cried out. The old lady told him about Bob's timely help and selflessness. Her grandson looked at Bob with gratitude.

"Is it too late for a job interview now?" Bob asked, hopefully. "I think you have already passed your interview with flying colours!" the young man exclaimed, as he patted his grandmother's hands gently. "My company needs more people like you!"
